other North African nations are inching closer to civil war. The Sunni Muslim majority in Iraq must fight for its survival against the Shiite Muslim majority. And the Saudi Arabian government is the first to target the Iranian economy. When the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991, the new nations discovered a long forgotten secret: Soviet-made obsolete military vehicles were being sold all around the world. This astounding revelation led to the creation of a unique documentary: Toys of the Maoists.

This documentary features the most revolutionary vehicle ever made in the history of Russian (and arguably the world) tank production – the T-55. The tank entered the stage in 1953 and immediately became a great success, leading to dozens of new models. Its design was attractive but it suffered from a number of problems which made the tank unworkable. This DVD puts the viewer through all the phases of the T-55's history. It starts in the 1950s and travels through the 1980s until it reaches the very last tank produced in 1985.

The presentation is very entertaining and enjoyable. The film makers have not only done a great job of editing this documentary but also included supporting segments that bring the viewer closer to the action. These include segments featuring a T-55 owner in China, a sports car fan in the USA, a restoration contractor in Russia, and the makers themselves in the US. The documentary starts with the T-55's birth in 1953 and takes the viewer through its history in all its phases. The DVD is edited well. The sections about the Soviet Army's history are presented in a straightforward manner. They start with the Cold War and then provide more information about the Russian military. The documentary is not biased and does not favor any particular point of view. In fact, its producers have even included sections that provide information about the T-55's shortcomings and its eventual demise. They explain the unique features of the tank and how it was a victim of its own success. The final segments of the DVD reveal the Soviet Army's move from being a peace-keeping army to an army that was prepared to fight wars. The Soviets began looking for a long-range tank that could destroy modern weaponry.

The T-55 fulfilled all their requirements. The Soviets tried everything to make the tank competitive in all aspects. This included the world's first man-portable anti-tank missile, the RPG-16. a69d392a70
