Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to database searching and searching engines, and more particularly to a multithreading of searching and searching engines. 2. Description of the Related Art A database search is the act of searching a database, generally a relational database, for records and retrieving the records. A database generally includes data, records, and metadata. A record generally includes the data for the record, and some metadata. The metadata may include key/value pairs for indexing the data. The key may be a column value of a table, or some identifier of the record. In order to perform a search of a database, a database search engine, also called a search engine, is generally used. Examples of database search engines include VNDB, Google, and Yahoo. Generally, a database search engine generally analyzes key-value pairs and may include specialized search functions built into the database search engine. In this way, a conventional database search engine may index an entire database and not merely individual records 09e8f5149f
