Newborn's body is an excellent window into the ancient past By Christine Albers, CNN Updated 6:34 PM ET, Tue September 4, 2013 A newborn baby in Thailand is seen with a tattoo of a phoenix on her foot. New research is uncovering ancient symbols and art on the bodies of people who lived before 4,000 years ago. In some cases, a baby's body is the only way to determine age. (CNN) -- Recently, a woman in rural Thailand gave birth to a baby with an ancient pattern etched onto the sole of her foot -- a phoenix, the fabled bird that represents the afterlife in Chinese and Korean mythology. The tattoo is about 3,600 years old. It was placed on the newborn's left foot, along with a series of hieroglyphs. Like the pre-historic symbols appearing on the bodies of infants in other parts of the world, these tattoos are a surprise given the presumed antiquity of people who had them. While art has been discovered etched onto the human body for more than 40,000 years, these tattoos are by far the oldest known. "We know from the stone tools that people have been performing tattoos since the Stone Age," said Alexandra M. Bryan, a researcher at the University of West Florida who has studied tattoos for most of her life. "Our study is part of an emerging field that looks at ancient art everywhere, in every corner of the world. We want to find out what these symbols mean." Tattoos are, of course, as old as mankind. According to Bryan's preliminary research, tattooing was used in ancient Mesopotamia, Egypt and the Andes, among other areas. But the art has been hiding in plain sight. A breakthrough "We know from the stone tools that people have been performing tattoos since the Stone Age," said Bryan, a University of West Florida researcher. Tattooing is a form of body modification that involves inking designs onto the skin using a needle or a heated iron, she said. For the ancient Egyptians, tattoos were often used for scarification, while the Mayans and Aztecs relied on them to give a personality to their people, she said. During the 19th century, tattooing was popularized by the Victorian era, and people were readily adopting the look. These days, tattooing is more than just a fashion statement -- it
