Archvision RPC Plugins 3.18.1.DS Max 2012 64bitÃ .Q: Preventing hijacking a Wi-Fi network I need to lock down a Wi-Fi network for use by one computer (client) only. It is a completely wired network, so nothing is done over the Internet and all traffic goes to the client only. I'm wondering if there is any way to prevent other computers from connecting to the network. It's not a big problem if a Wi-Fi router could be swapped out - for example for my initial set-up I used a router with only a web interface and no control over the network (the computer was hardwired to it). I know I could install some kind of software on the router but I'd prefer not to go that route as I have a reason not to want to make any changes on the router. It is possible to lock down Wi-Fi networks in Windows 8.1, I guess using some kind of password-less SSID? EDIT: As mentioned in the comments, I'm open to changing the authentication method (using a connection between the client and the router) A: Depending on your devices, there are several options. Both for Unix/Linux (e.g. Desktop/laptop) and for Windows there are the following: The PC (client) can have the same SSID like the router the PC can use a whole different SSID Now to "lock" it down: The router has to somehow deny
