The drop was due to bad news from Japan, where the Bank of Japan is raising interest rates. Meanwhile, South Korea's central bank raised its interest rate and the US Federal Reserve also hiked its rate. Apple faces down questions about withering sales and shrinking profit margins "Bad news from Japan caused investors in the region to sell." Roughly 19 minutes before Apple's fall, Japanese markets were overwhelmingly down a day after a long-expected central bank rate increase pushed up borrowing costs for some consumers and companies. The yen soared, along with shares and bonds that were already down due to skepticism about how quickly the economy will pull out of its worst slump in nearly two decades. Apple shares for its first time plunged 5 percent, and were under pressure for much of the afternoon. They were down a total of 4.4 percent at $559.70 on the Nasdaq at the opening bell, and slipped further to $553.84 at the close. With a stronger yen pushing Apple's margins down further, investors went short, the Strategy and Investment bank Nomura said in a report citing the weak US dollar.

Q: What's the difference between a "dynamic library" and a "shared object"? I'm working on a C++ project that is structured as multiple dynamic libraries. My project is a client, and one of the libraries it depends upon is the shared object I mentioned in the title. I have a situation where that library needs to be loaded from a separate application. The application dynamically loads its own libraries when it is first launched. I'm trying to figure out what this shared object is and if it is the same as a dynamic library. My notion is that the shared object is simply a dynamically-linked static library file - that is to say, a binary file referencing all the libraries it needs dynamically. However, my colleague says this is just a zipped / "packed" archive, and it is not the same. It seems that "shared objects" are somehow linked inside the running process, while "dynamic libraries" are linked to the application. Do we have two separate terms for this? Or might he be making a mistake and this is actually the same - the difference is between static and dynamic loading? A: Static linking means that all the objects are loaded into the same process but are linked at build time. Dynamic linking means that the libraries are loaded into the process where they are used so they can be optimized by the JIT compiler. A: What's the difference between a "dynamic library" and a "shared object"? The traditional and still mostly widely used definition is a dynamic library is just a library that has a shared object file which is statically linked, i.e. there is no actual dynamic or run time linking, just linking from a shared object file. A 'shared object', simply, is a common file used for sharing a set of libraries amongst multiple processes. Any file (.o or
