Endogenously synthesized lysyl oxidase is expressed in human vascular wall lesions, a finding that may account for the lysyl oxidase cross-link density in vascular diseases. Lysyl oxidase is the enzymatically active maturation unit of collagen cross-links. As such, lysyl oxidase activity/expression is a marker for collagen cross-link formation. The lysyl oxidase enzyme has been localized at sites of collagenous tissue remodeling in the skin and in the circulatory system. Thus, we sought to determine whether lysyl oxidase expression in the vascular wall was associated with disease processes in vascular wall lesions. Tissue sections from atherosclerotic and aneurysmal lesions in carotid endarterectomy specimens were stained for the presence of lysyl oxidase protein, using an avidin-biotin-peroxidase technique. Confirmation of the specificity of the staining was performed by preabsorption of the primary antibody with lysyl oxidase or by Western blotting with a purified fusion protein. Positive staining was seen in all the pathologic lesions, and in the majority of sections from normal controls. Double-immunofluorescent staining was performed for lysyl oxidase and the macrophage-marker CD68 or the smooth muscle cell-marker alpha smooth muscle actin. Tissue sections from atherosclerotic plaques were
