Some animals (e.g., mammals) have the ability to manufacture proteins to be used as replacements for structural or functional proteins which are missing in their own bodies. The manufacture of such a replacement protein is generally known as "regenerative medicine." In this process, a functional or structural protein is either taken from an organism such as a mammal, or from an extract of cells, such as an animal or human cell extract or fraction, or it can be synthesized from amino acids in vitro using a suitable protein-synthesizing system. An example of such a protein-synthesizing system is the cell-free translation system derived from wheat germ. This system has been widely used in the past to synthesize proteins from nucleotide (i.e., mRNA) sequences complementary to the AUG coding sequence in eukaryotic mRNAs in an in vitro reaction. The ability to synthesize a protein in vitro is advantageous since it allows the protein to be obtained in unlimited quantities and under conditions that are suited for the purification of the protein. One class of proteins that are useful in therapy are the interferons (IFN's), and other cytokines such as the transforming growth factor beta-1 (TGF-β1) and tumor necrosis factor-α (TNF-α). Such proteins are used in the treatment of a wide range of disorders, including autoimmune disorders, viral infections, and tumors. However, IFN-α is a labor intensive, expensive drug that is administered by intramuscular injection. The problems of production and administration make the use of recombinant IFN-α to treat a wide range of disorders very expensive.To the Editor: In light of the requirement for COVID-19-related school closures in New York State,[@bib1] we are interested
