1. **DIAGRAM C.1** Traditional photo retouching makes a large distinction between black-and-white conversion and colour conversion.

The former is converting an image from its original black-and-white state (hence the name) to some other look. The latter is converting a black-and-white image to a more realistic colour-rich look, like digital colour.

2. **DIAGRAM C.2** With some editing programs you can apply a range of filter effects to an image to change the look of it. Filters have presets that are similar to the look and feel of older film stocks. In the case of lightroom, filters may have their own presets or they can be individually adjusted. 3.

you get a totally different look from the previous one. Filters can apply colours and saturate or lighten images or create a sharpening effect.

4. **DIAGRAM C.4** Adobe has a number of image editors for you to use: Bridge, Photoshop, Lightroom, and so on. In this case, the "photo" is referring to a digital photograph. They all provide different tools and features. It is good to have a good sense of the quality of tools and features and know which tool is best for the image that you are editing. If you are unsure, get a good book on the subject. It is not too difficult to learn to use any of these tools, but you should know which one is best suited to your needs. 5.

**DIAGRAM C.5** After you've finished your image editing, you may want to save the edited image to file so you can use it again later in the process or share it with others. Save the edited images in your preferred file format, such as JPEG, TIFF, or PSD, for presentation on the Web, for storage on CDs, DVDs, or other media, and so on. # Chapter 9 #

I recently had the pleasure of running a workshop for Denizens San Diego and found the results interesting. Since I am the educator behind the project, I thought I would share some of the workshop results with you. I wrote about the workshop here. As we started with my first workshop, I asked the attendees to reflect on the brief curriculum we had discussed. They wrote down what they wanted to make in the 10 weeks before workshop started. After completing the workshop, I asked the attendees what they had created. Now, there was one group of people who hadn't done much before. Most of them felt not confident enough to share a project. They took it as a negative feedback. They were scared about the public's reactions. One felt that his design idea was too derivative. And he hadn't kept it to himself. He also felt inferior compared to the others. I asked this group to reflect on the feedback they received and what they did next. Many had the same reaction, which surprised me. They somehow felt unlucky. And I realized that although I was concerned, it was unfair to put them on the spot and make them explain themselves. Not only did this create a challenge of their own, but it also denied other people who were interested in the workshop the chance to participate. So, I decided to share their feedback with you. I also decided to give them the chance to share their feedback. So, I will post the feedback to you. These are their reflections: “I was scared to share my idea, or afraid of being judged or told “I didn’t know”. After going through the workshop, I was able to articulate my idea which I had been struggling with for a long time. I even had mockups. I didn't know if it was good enough for me to share it. But I figured it was either too good not to share or that it wasn't good enough so I might as well share it. The best thing that I did was ask for feedback. I received a lot of praise, a lot of compliments, and a lot of criticism. My peer review enabled me to understand my design better. At one point, the feedback I received was detrimental. But I was able to overcome that.

Design of a manual shape-customized soft tissue fill technique using a 3D printer. To design a new manual shape-customized soft tissue fill (SFTF) technique using a 3D printer and verify the feasibility of this approach. Ten volunteers (15.5 +/- 2.3 years, 12 males, 2 females) participated in this study. The geometric data acquired by a 3D scanning device were input to a 3D printer to create two 3D models of soft tissue fill (1.7-2.0 cm<sup>3</sup>) for a single inner nostril. SFTF was then performed by trying each of the two models on each nostril of the volunteers and the procedure was video recorded. Finally, the two 3D models were inspected and evaluated by the volunteers. The quality of the two 3D models and the SFTF process was good in all cases. The mean time required to fill the inner nostril was 26 +/- 8 s. All volunteers agreed that the two models could be easily made and that the SFTF procedure was easy. The SFTF technique reported in this study could be considered a viable option for filling the lateral septal, particularly in those with a large defect or scar on the nostril. Conformational effects of adrenodoxin and adrenodoxin reductase in electron-transfer complexes with adrenodoxin reductase investigated by resonance Raman spectroscopy. Resonance Raman (RR) spectroscopy was used to study the conformational effects of adrenodoxin (Adx) and adrenodoxin reductase (AdR) in electron-transfer complexes with AdR. AdR(I136V) in which a conserved isoleucine at position 136 of AdR was replaced by a valine was used in all experiments. In the standard electron-transfer complex of the wild type with AdR(I136V), both Adx and AdR are in the reduced, open, and highly distorted conformation, as deduced from previously reported resonance Raman and stopped-flow studies. The I136V mutation causes a severe conformation change of AdR from the closed to open conformation. It was shown by combination of RR and far-UV circular dichroism spectroscopy that the I136V mutation causes the loss of interactions of Met78, Phe30, and

---

Phe33 of AdR with Adx, thus allowing the AdR to adopt a completely open conformation which consists
