are closed and compact 3D structures derived from nonadherent culture of single cells, forming cell aggregates in aqueous media when quiescent ([@r1][@r2][@r3][@r4][@r5][@r6][@r7][@r8][@r9][@r10][@r11]--[@r12]). Spheroids are attractive for cell-based bioprocessing because they display higher yields of target products at earlier stages of culturing than expected in conventional 2D cell culture ([@r13][@r14][@r15][@r16][@r17]--[@r18]), and because they provide a bioprocessing platform with modular architectures for high- throughput cell screening ([@r19][@r20][@r21]--[@r22]), cell enrichment ([@r5], [@r6], [@r8], [@r10]), cell prioritization ([@r9]), and metabolic engineering ([@r7]). The formation of spheroids commonly involves diffusion-limited aggregation, in which single cells adhere to one another and simultaneously aggregate due to the depletion of soluble molecules from the medium, thereby resulting in spheroid formation ([@r9], [@r13]). At the single-cell level, this process is governed by a set of alignment rules to maintain the integrity of spheroids, namely body-shrinking, fusion, and spheroid endocytosis ([@r9], [@r23][@r24]--[@r25]). For standard tumor cell spheroids, the sedimentation rate of cells as they sink to the bottom provides an indicator of the radius and density of tumor spheroids ([@r26]). It can be used to determine the time that the spheroids attain a critical size at which they can collapse in sedimentation-based self-replicating protocols ([@r9]). However, assessing the sedimentation rate of spheroids from conventional techniques, such as microscopy or Coulter counting using a light obscuration detector, is limited by the availability of dye markers. Furthermore, most existing techniques are not applied to non-tumor spheroids, e.g., air-lifted spheroids for the production of hepatitis C virus ribonucleic acid ([@r15]). Thus, the practical application of spheroid sedimentation rate remains an unresolved challenge
