proposal for fiscal year 2020, which calls for slashing the Department of Energy's budget by 20 percent, while either cutting or eliminating other programs. On the heels of this proposal, there have been a series of news reports that the proposed cuts to the Department of Energy will include the Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy (EERE) — though it has yet to be officially confirmed. Following the president's proposal, experts from academia and industry explained that the likely impacts of EERE budget cuts are already affecting projects being carried out across the country. It is unclear whether these cuts will actually be enacted. "The whole business model of federal R&D funding is really a kind of cottage industry," Nick Zavatacos, the director of the University of Washington Energy Program and a science and technology policy expert, told E&E News. "A lot of the contracting and the awards go out on an annual basis, and so this is an annual thing that is going to have a huge impact on everybody's research portfolios over the next couple of years." According to the New York Times, one of EERE's current priorities is developing wind and solar technology. While the Trump administration has yet to confirm whether or not EERE's budget will be reduced, CNET reported that this budget proposal will likely include either funding cuts or eliminating some programs. "There is a lot of momentum around wind and solar, but there is still a low level of investment in basic research," William Happer, a physicist at Princeton University and member of the National Security Council under President Trump, told the Washington Examiner. "It is a pretty clear recommendation to stop all the basic science on the basis of a national security argument." In 2017, there were $9.8 billion in awards to various projects across the country, which are awarded on a competitive basis and cover a wide array of topics including energy efficiency, advanced fossil fuels, renewable power, energy storage, new energy vehicles and advanced materials. Around two-thirds of these projects are d0c515b9f4
