Q: How can I add tabs to my custom navigation controller? I have a custom navigation bar in my app. I wanted to add a couple of buttons to the view. I can't figure out how to add the view as a tab. How can I add a tab to my custom navigation controller? A: You can use this code [self.navigationController setViewControllers:@[controller1,controller2] animated:NO]; Where first controller is your navigationController and second controller is a new view controller A: What you want to do is set a new navigation controller's viewController property to point at your new view controller. However, you cannot do this in Interface Builder, you have to do it in code. Here is how to set the viewController property in code. You should be able to swap this out for setting the viewControllers property with the same code. [UIView transitionWithView:self.navigationController.view duration:0.5 options:UIViewAnimationOptionTransitionFlipFromRight animations:^(self.navigationController.viewController = self.mySecondController;) completion:^(BOOL finished) { self.navigationController.view.transform = CGAffineTransformMakeRotation(M_PI); }]; The idea is that you start with the nav controller's view controller, and then apply an animation where it removes the old view controller, but leaves the nav bar itself already showing the second view controller. Then you apply a rotation of the nav bar to show the second view controller as if it were the navigation controller's view. What's New In?

It is most widely known in the art that coating on an automotive body is carried out by electro-coating (electrodeposition coating), which involves coating a conductive primer to a non-coating surface of the automotive body, coating a main coat to the primer, removing uncured paint from the automotive body, and baking the automotive body at a temperature above 100.degree. C. to cure the paint. In recent years, technology for applying a paint to a resin substrate after subjecting it to a pre-treatment has been developed, and the resin substrates are progressively applied to the automotive body in recent years. A principal process for the pre-treatment of the automotive body is an electro-cleaning, which involves carrying out a pre-treatment such as a degreasing operation and then electro-coating to the automotive body. This pre-treatment is carried out by performing an electro-cleaning operation to remove a surface contamination film on the automotive body and remove an excessive coating film to maintain an original film thickness. For the pre-treatment, a method involving repeatedly performing a pre-treatment with an alkaline aqueous solution having a specified pH value and an electro-cleaning with an acidic aqueous solution having a specified pH value has been proposed and put to practical use. The pre-treatment with the alkaline aqueous solution forms an oxide film on the surface of the substrate, and the electro-cleaning with the acidic aqueous solution causes the oxide film to dissolve and form a hydroxide film, which act as an etching agent. Thus, the electro-cleaning with the acidic aqueous solution cleans the coating film and the surface film on the automotive body. Technologies for forming a coating, such as a pre-treatment, have been disclosed in the Patent Literatures 1 to 8. For example, Patent Literature 1 discloses an electro-chemical processing device for subjecting an automotive body to an electro-cleaning operation. This electro-chemical processing device is installed at a paint shop where a coating operation and a pre-treatment operation are performed and has a processing machine for performing the coating operation and a pre-treatment machine for performing the pre-treatment operation, the processing machine and the pre-treatment machine being configured so that these operations are performed by alternate switching. In addition, Patent Literatures 2 to 8 disclose arts for increasing the treating effect on the automotive body by performing the pre-treatment in a state where the automotive body is
