Biological weapons are among the most effective offensive and defensive weapons on the battlefield. Biological Warfare: Biological warfare is a form of biological terrorism which involves the intentional use of viruses, bacteria, or other biological agents (germs) to inflict harm on human, animal, or plant life. It can also be used to deliberately spread illness, disease, or death. This form of warfare is a type of biological terrorism. Biological weapons are also known as germ weapons, germ warfare, or germ warfare agents. While there are many different kinds of biological weapons, most can be categorized into one of four groups: (1) conventional bacteria, (2) chemical agents, (3) other infectious diseases, or (4) pathogens engineered for use as biological weapons. Biological agents are not usually considered to be militarily valuable as a result of the laws of war (although they could become more common). However, biological agents have the potential to cause serious harm or death to humans, animals, plants, or even micro-organisms. To exploit the ability of bacteria, viruses, and other agents to cause harm, such agents are deliberately deployed by states as chemical or biological weapons. At the edge of the Subtropical Front, the surface is so cold that it is possible to keep a drink of water in your mouth for a long time without freezing, and a body of water can freeze solid
