See, When the Metal Caves, You Have to Move the Power Cables It's been a long time coming, but the first lighting is finally in place for Oregon Museum of Science and Industry's new eastern campus. The lights are scattered throughout, from the bottom of the slide-and-flip sculpture to the top of the wavefront-shaped darkroom in the new Science Adventure Center. And now the Oregonian's newest exhibit, Living Machine, is packed and unpacked, pushed from one end of the museum to the other. But most of those lights aren't attached to the ceiling yet. That's because the museum has to figure out a place to run power to them all. That's a problem every science museum has to face when building a new wing. And since the e-mail went out from the facility's general manager, it's turned into a good learning opportunity for the museum's staff. Take a tour of the new Science Adventure Center. The new eastern wing is packed and packed with exhibits. A design flaw In 2007, OMSI officials decided they needed to build an eastern wing to house new exhibits and an expanded exhibit hall. The museum had been growing, and officials knew they would need some more space for science demonstrations and for exhibits that might bring in larger crowds. But when they started discussing how to build the new wing, they discovered there was a problem with the design. The building would sit atop a series of large underground caverns. And in those caverns, the museum needed a place to feed power and data to the new exhibits. Once OMSI hired their current general manager, Larry Edson, that became the top priority. The facility had to figure out how to keep the museum running, while at the same time build an east wing that could sit above a series of caverns. Finding power The project had been quietly going along for years, so the staff has plenty of experience with building things underground. So when the facility was first planning this new wing, they decided that, yes, they could put the lights, the computers, the wiring and everything else in the caverns. But this plan ran into a problem. "We found out very early on that, if you have
