The pulmonary tissues of patients who die with chronic obstructive lung disease (COLD) are examined pathologically. This examination, which usually includes x-ray, light microscopy, and scanning electron microscopy, reveals essentially three sources for COLD: (1) enlargement of the conducting airways by overinflation and hypertrophy of the bronchial and bronchiolar epithelium (or by mucoid impaction of the lining layer); (2) narrowing of the airway lumen due to airway wall fibrosis and/or injury to the mucosa; and (3) obstruction of the lumen secondary to thickening of the bronchiolar and alveolar epithelia and/or formation of edema, granulation tissue, and/or hyaline membrane. As a corollary, the anatomic changes that occur in the respiratory system with airway obstruction, the development of hypertrophy and hyperplasia of the epithelia, and the formation of mucosal lesions are discussed, with special emphasis on the epithelium.

The major implications for etiology, the definition of COLD as "obstructive," and the implications of these observations for animal models of COLD are highlighted.

Q: String Deserialization in a DLL with parameters I am using a DLL with an interface like this:

public interface IXMLSerializer { public Stream Convert(string xml); }
The DLL has an implementation like this:
public XmlSerializer(string xml) { if (String.IsNullOrEmpty(xml)) { throw new ArgumentException("xml is null or empty.", "xml"); } try {
