The viceroy's palace — a majestic house at the center of the colonial city — has long been home to a social club and an art gallery. The building was taken over by the city's Historical Preservation Commission as a monument to San Jose's past and was designated as a historic landmark in 1966. In September, the commission decided to sell the four-story house and two outbuildings to reduce budget deficits at the agency. The agency plans to use the proceeds to help balance its budget through the year ending in June 2018, said Tim Hibbard, the commission's senior planner. Once the commission completes the sale, "the building will come down completely and it will be converted into condominiums," he said. Hibbard said other historic properties in San Jose, including the Palace at Hamilton, will also be added to the city's inventory of historic landmarks. But he said it will be difficult to find sites that are aesthetically pleasing. "There are few buildings left that are as beautiful as the Palace of the Viceroy," he said. If the commission sells the houses on either side of the main palace — the Bishops Estate and the former Bishops residence the owners will have to create a new street by connecting the side buildings to the street in front of the palace, Hibbard said. Under the proposed condominium conversion, the commission expects to retain ownership of the cultural and historical value of the buildings, Hibbard said. c6a93da74d
