I've noticed that in Typescript, the following two statements are equivalent: `var anyNumber = 0; var typeof anyNumber = "number";` But I realized that they are also equivalent to the following in a class: `var anyNumber = new Number(); var typeof anyNumber = "number";` I'm curious about what's the difference between these two ways of creating a union or a type? And since `anyNumber` is being converted from a primitive to a type by the compiler, I'd like to know if it makes a difference which I should use in this situation. A: Both cases lead to the same result, but the second case is more appropriate. `var anyNumber = new Number(); // type of anyNumber is "number" var` typeof anyNumber = "number"; // type of anyNumber is number var anyString = 'abc'; // type of anyString is "string" var typeof anyString = "string"; // type of anyString is string

You can find the difference between boolean and string type is in this answer: Is there any difference between the "typeof" keywords in TypeScript? When you're trying to tell a story, the first and most important element is the characters. You can tell a wonderfully rich story with the most fantastical and technically accomplished visual effects, but if your characters are annoying or your dialogue is terrible, you're out of luck. But when it comes to visual effects, if you don't have a good cast, you have zero chance at a good story or a satisfying visual experience. Today, we take a look at some of the best and worst video game acting performances. At the beginning of the original "Soul Hunter" video game, we meet Mila Strigari, a woman who believes that her sister N c6a93da74d
