Checking Activation Code Please Wait Apache Air Assault

Here a sample log file generated by the Software License Management (SLM) after the license had been activated: keywords:bigip, bigip, apache, http, travis-ci, scap, activated, slm, license, lck, lck Severity: Error Message: Checking activation code please wait apache air assault With the default /invalidate property, every activation effectively invalidates all.html files (when their path matches the /invalidate section). On a website with considerable traffic, multiple, subsequent activations will increase the cpu load on the backend. In such a scenario, it would be desirable to throttle.stat file touching to keep the website responsive. You can do this by using the /gracePeriod property. The SLM recognizes a license as activated if the /invalidate is not set. When the license is activated, the SLM notices the end of the validity period. Therefore, each SLM operation can be set to run only once within the validity period. The SLM performs operations that might require validation on the license. During this phase, the SLM is able to reliably detect that the license is valid and that its lifetime is in force. If the operation was successful and generated the data in mcpd, one could theoretically run the tmsl save sys config manually. This could or could not work and is unreliable. The recommendation is to ignore the error, since the code that is calling this isn't essential to the operation of the BIG-IP system. The BIG-IP system will retry the procedure automatically the next time there is a license re-activation. Further attempts to save the configuration could succeed in the future. This is most likely a problem with contention and will need to be fixed. If the operation was successful and generated the data in mcpd, one could theoretically run the tmsl save sys config manually.
