In the early days of Minding Movies, the discussion tended to be about genres, but since Media Unlimited and some of the transition essays in Camera Obscura, Bordwell and Thompson have broadened the discussion to include how film interacts with other media such as games and television, and how Hollywood and Hollywood film interact with the film audience. The chapters on motion picture sound and the evolution of sound film reflect the influence of intellectual historian Thomas Schatz, including essays on The Jazz Singer and the techniques of early sound film. Camera Obscura (2 volumes), Speak, Memory: Cinema and the Invention of History, The Future of Film Studies (with Richard Roud), Screening Space, Minding Movies (selected essays, edited by Kristin Thompson). In my own view, argumentation, or the drawing out of implications from premises, is the most important form of close reading, as evidenced by my insistence on the importance of this method in the courses I have taught. Bordwell and Thompson support their analysis with numerous comparisons and references to other historians of film and filmmakers, as well as with compelling case studies of individual films. To my knowledge, the only comparable film-theory blog is that of Diana Kantartzi . This is a welcome antidote to the many self-styled 'theorists' who write self-indulgently or else write badly. The two most innovative applications of close-reading theory to film in recent years are found in Spike Lee's 'Comic Book Dracula' and Tim League's Gay Divorce. Both feature impressively constructed narratives of how

series of titles of varying degrees
of comprehensiv

eness and value.

The authors of film art: an introduction take up the matter of style and reading
in film, following
the concepts of film noir and the Hollywood
cinema. The film art book is unique in the sense that it is neither intended

for a narrow technical audience nor an academic readership.

Rather, it is designed to be both entertaining
and educational.

The third and fourth editions include more than 50 in-depth examples and detailed descriptions of the images that illustrate the book. These include both archival photographs and new production

stills, as well as carefully framed
enlargements
that make it possible for the reader to study
the artistry and craftsmanship of some of the most talented

directors and technicians who have ever made movies. Film art :
