Microsofts cloud-based productivity applications, including Office Online and Excel Online, have been widely criticised by many office workers. Among those most vociferous have been government workers who use these applications, which are free, to store and edit government documents. I know that a lot of people in our community were dependent on the volume-licensed end user license model and software distribution model. It's no surprise that many of you would now be complaining about Microsoft Office 2016 on the cloud. Believe it or not, this was also a choice that the office users themselves in the United States made when they licensed the Office 2010 version. This occurred to align Office 2013 and Office 2016 not only to feature parity with Office 2010, but also be able to leverage the benefits of cloud-based services without having to build and manage those services for users. Ugh. Office 2016. In the spirit of the free fun I intended to start having, I decided to run the Office 2016 installer and see what else that version had to offer. Its popularity has been growing steadily since launching as a beta last year, making it not only an excellent Office title for the clouds, but also an excellent general productivity tool. All I can say is, Imagine that the people who bought Office 2010 were still on Office 2007. However, we can certainly talk about the problems associated with the cloud-based version of Office. We are very disappointed that these companies chose to adopt this cloud-based pricing model without knowing or contemplating the ramifications that it would have on their long-time, loyal customers.
