Master's Thesis. Belgrade: International Centre for Energy, Resources and Environment. Abstract The objective of the study is to examine the evolution of attitudes of the population towards the construction of the Zimnica hydropower plant, on the one hand, and to determine the influence of the media on the opinions of the population, on the other. The study was carried out through two research methods - internet-based survey and survey through face-to-face interviews. The first survey was conducted in November 2007, while the second was conducted in February 2008. The average survey response rate was 36%. The respondents with completed survey form were distributed as follows: 42.55% women, 57.45% men. The sample was stratified and balanced for age, gender and level of education in terms of place of residence. The first survey was conducted among the adults, while the second one was conducted among the youth of Belgrade. The respondents from the media were chosen through three methods: telephone calls to editors of the print media, e-mails to the online editors and e-mails to the editors of the print media and online media. The objective of the media calls was to interview the authors or journalists of the media entities. The authors of the publications in the print media or online media were then contacted through the e-mail. As a result of the study, it has been established that the construction of the Zimnica hydropower plant in the northern area of Serbia has not been accompanied by any negative effects. The assessed mood of the population was positive, hence they were prepared to accept the creation of the project. The respondents of the first survey differed significantly from the respondents of the second survey with respect to perception of the construction of the Zimnica hydropower plant. The data show that the construction of the Zimnica hydropower plant has promoted the development of the civil society by encouraging the emergence of an alternative media and public opinion, thus strengthening the public sphere.
