Lightroom 5 adds a few new features to the external graphics editing tool. One, you can now search for the last file used to edit a specific item in the library. In this case, I wanted to search for an image that had been updated relatively recently. I'd clicked it into the catalog and then into the photo editor. I wanted to make sure the image update went through before I checked the file's versions. Now I had a chance to find it. Another feature I like is an easily accessible Add to Project button. You can click this button and then choose "Collaborate" or "Capture" to quickly change the Lightroom look. As with Lightroom 4's camera-lens profile, you can also choose to save your current Lightroom settings. What I like about the button is that these automatically switch when the main panel changes. Lightroom 2 does have a nice "Import to Library" button, but for my use, it could be a bit more user-friendly. As I said, the button is on the external graphics editing tool's taskbar. It's a dialog box as well, which is usually a bad thing. But, the one good thing about it is that it easily identifies what you need, its location and allows you to change its look with ease.
