If you are a beginner though, you will probably be happy with the new functions. Of course, if you are already a power user and know many of Adobe's features by heart, then you probably know enough how to use them in Lightroom to make whatever you want. Only, you have a new toolbox for that purpose. Although the interface isn't the flashiest (nor is it totally new), I believe that it is good looking. This is important as well, as Lightroom has long been criticized by many to look like an Apple app. Let's see what's new. Image Preview is lighter than before, but that's about it. Ctrl+E is still present. It seems to be replaced with Image Management and, therefore, is not as convenient. You also have the new tag tool that looks very similar to the one in Lightroom 4, but differs in that you get all the extra information you need when you highlight a tag in the image preview. I believe that this is a major step forward for family tree software. You can of course also define if a tag isn't shown by repeating image capture or going back to the photo. Speaking of which, check the camera feed in the bottom right corner on the main screen and remember that you need to use a Wi-Fi internet connection to trigger the camera live feed. One of the camera's drawbacks I feel is that it doesn't see the exact date or time you take a picture. Other than that, it's true that you can then, as before, save the camera feed to a local file of your choice and import it into Photoshop. Of course, then you lose the possibility to easily publish the final, edited image to your social media sites.
